

LITERARY NOTES.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1891.—TWELVE PAGES.

Whether the Real or the Fiction or the Real of prophet and poet? "He will never be a great artist," says a writer in "The Contemporary Review," "who does not aim at 'the better'—who has not a vision of unrealized beauty before him, an ideal after which he strives, ever lifting him forward, but never actually touched—the gleam, the light that never was on sea or land." The artist, be he poet or painter, is not a mere copyist of nature; he is her interpreter, her prophet, giving articulate expression to her own spirit. Hermès lies the value of the antique to the student of art. The great artists of Greece were realists and idealists in one. They were scrupulously true to nature; but they idealized her. Sophocles claimed credit for depicting men as they ought to be—i.e., he painted humanity, not individuals. Aristotle, who quoted the boast of Sophocles with approbation, praises Polygnotus, because he painted men better than they are; and in his "Poetics" he forbids the pictures of Pauson to be shown to young children because he painted men below the ordinary level of human nature. Zola is a bad artist, because his delineation of human nature is an outrage on humanity at large."

Franz Enden-Henne, the sister of the poet Heine, is now preparing for publication her correspondence with her brother. He wrote to her often and confidentially.

The "Tauchnitz Magazine," which appeared in Germany for the first time this month, has had much success. Like the long list of English and American books from the same famous house, books so familiar and so welcome to travellers in Europe, it is only intended for circulation on the Continent. Each number will contain a complete story. It is sold for the modest price of 50 pfennigs, or 12 1/2 cents. Educated Germans, who are usually good linguists, have for many years manifested a great fondness for English and American literature. To this native tendency, more than to the custom of travelling Englishmen and Americans, the Tauchnitz house owes its immense success.

The fourth article of Theodore Stanton upon Abraham Lincoln appears in the September number of "The Westminster Review" (London). It deals particularly with Lincoln's moral qualities, including his religious sentiments. Mr. Stanton, in summing up what has been written upon this point by all those who had the best opportunity of acquaintance with Lincoln, says: "A man about whose theology such things can be said is, of course, far removed from orthodoxy. It may even be questioned whether he is a theist, whether he is a deist. That he is a free-thinker is evident; that he is an agnostic is probable. Addison's line seems to fit the case: 'Atheism is an old-fashioned word; I am a free-thinker.' In connection with Frederick Douglass's relations to Lincoln, Mr. Stanton tells this new anecdote that came under his personal observation: 'Two other men of distinction made, in this respect, perhaps a deeper impression on the present United States Minister to Hayti. When Douglass bade good-by to Victor Schoeller, the famous French abolitionist, the latter kissed him on both cheeks. As we left the house and walked down the Rue Dronot, Douglass was silent for some time. Then, turning on me suddenly, he exclaimed, as if having at length recalled the fact: But two white men have ever kissed me; one is Senator Schoeller and the other was Gerrit Smith.'
